Lauren Brody has made a great success of her business. “Come For Dinner” has earned a name for itself in the world of catering, serving some of Seattle’s most exclusive private dinners for the corporate black tie set. Her careful attention to the smallest detail has set her and her business apart, and she’s just beginning to put her painful past behind her. The deaths of her father and brother, along with the painful breakup of a previous engagement, have convinced her that the best focus for her energies is work. But her latest client is giving her ideas that are definitely not all business.

Cameron Price has come to Seattle determined to make a success of himself. His new position as CEO should offer him all the challenge he needs and plenty of opportunities to prove he is the man for the job. But his mentor seems convinced Cameron needs a woman by his side to properly entertain the financial backers that he rubs elbows with for combined business and pleasure. Soon a simple dinner party leads to the beginnings of a much more complicated scenario, as Cameron convinces Lauren to be his make-believe girlfriend in return for all the high profile catering she can handle.
