Gwyn Murphy wants nothing more than to call in sick as she makes her way out of the nursing home where her grandmother lives. A storm is coming in hard and fast, and it hits unexpectedly as a deer freezes on the road causing her to swerve into a ditch. No cell service leads her to walk through the pouring rain where she meets upon a trooper.

Sparks fly the moment these two touch, and they continue to do so each time. Trooper Aiden Loughlin can't get his mind off Gwyn long after she has left the station, and he knows there is something more. Just what connects them is a legend older than time, but they don't know that. To them it is just a spring storm.

This story takes a look at how one day can change the lives of two people forever. Kelly Maher holds nothing back as these two meet and meet once again. The connection these two share is inexplicable and undeniable. Gwyn and Aiden must explore it. The story is short, and the exploration felt a bit rushed to this reader.

I would have loved to see more of these two in action before they jump into bed. The joining didn't feel at all realistic, but that is because of the external circumstances bringing these two together. In a fantasy world created by the author, these two work. I was just left wanting more.
